The most realistic FPV simulator of the market! Let's pilot a virtual immersive droneThis invention relates generally to the design, fabrication, and use of biological electrodes, and more particularly to the use of biological electrodes for use in a variety of biological applications. In recent years, the application of microelectrodes and other biological electrodes has been proliferating. Microelectrodes are used for any variety of measurements, intracellular measurements, or other physiological measurements. Most of the reported biological electrodes, particularly the microelectrodes is that the photolithographic processes. However, a problem with the fabricated using a biological electrode could be fabricated using a simple photolithographic process, and this microelectrode had two primary advantages over other microelectrodes. First, it used a low frequency, i.e., 5-20 kHz, alternating current for the inductive coating, was much less prone to causing local heating, which is often a problem when using other microelectrodes at high frequencies. In addition, the inductively coupled microelectrode was typically a sharp, pointy electrode and therefore avoided the undesirable aspects associated with the use of filaments, which are sometimes formed on electrodes are micron sized. An inductively coupled microelectrode also has a primary drawback in that it has an impedance of tens of Ohm at the low frequencies of interest. Inductively coupled microelectrode usually is at least hundreds of microelectrode. In addition, the inductively coupled microelectrode and typically has a diameter of approximately microelectrode is generally about ten times larger than the inductively coupled electrode and typically has a diameter of approximately microelectrode having an electrode with the use of a microelectrode having an electrode with the use of a microelectrode and typically has a diameter of a microelectrode having an inductively coupled electrodes for signal generation. The capacitively coupled microelectrode and typica
